Download AdGuard Premium 6 Full Version. In late November, a Republican strategist complained that the party had simply been swallowed up by Donald Trump. "I'm starting to feel a lot like this party is being swallowed by [Trump] in a lot of ways," admitted Mike Murphy, a consultant for former Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. "I see that there are some things about Trump that I don't necessarily like," Murphy said at the time, but "it's a dysfunctional democracy, in a way." Trump may be bad for the GOP, but at least he's entertaining. But now the more conventional Republicans in Washington are getting worried. From the start, they worried that Trump would embarrass the GOP, saying things that would hurt their campaign. But they're now worried that he's already doing it – and that he has no intention of listening to them. If they had been able to fight it, they'd have put a stop to Trump's appearances on Saturday Night Live. But they haven't been able to fight him, and it's clear he doesn't intend to give them a voice. "In any other context, we wouldn't have a problem with someone saying those things and maybe talking and maybe not saying them," said Murphy, the strategist. "And he's absolutely uncompromising in what he says. But I can tell you it's almost like watching an Al Sharpton episode of 'Saturday Night Live.' I mean, the language that gets used." "I don't know why he's always playing these childish games," said Murphy. "You know, it's almost like it's an act – how he's waving the toys. And it sort of bugs the hell out of me. And it bugs a lot of people. A lot of people just are not attracted by it." "It's a little thing but it's a big thing," said Murphy. "It's an indication of how polarized we've gotten as a country. You have all these different wings of the Republican Party and none of them are happy about what he's saying." Trump's weakness as a politician is that he doesn't really care what anyone thinks, as 55cdc1ed1c
